Art Fairs

Great Art Isn't Always What It Seems: 5 Works at Art Basel That Deserve a Closer Look

The best works at the blue-chip art fair can be tricksters.

Andrew Goldstein, June 16, 2017

Art Basel Unlocked opened out by Hans Peter Feldmann at 2016 Gallery Crawls. Courtesy FAIRS COPYRIGHTS/Getty Images.

SHARE

At Art Basel, the premier vault of global fine art, superstesses can often be found in the VIP lounge, sipping champagne and nibbling on caviar. It can seem to be ancient can actually be cutting edge. A photograph, too, here, is not always really a photograph. There are several works of depth and mystery on display at the blue-chip art fair that rewards the fair-afters those who take a pause to look, listen, and learn.

DARIUS
Galerie Nathalie Obadia — Paris

Born in Istanbul in 1938 as the son of an Armenian butcher, Sarkis Darbyson became drawn to art at a young age when he happened to see a Giacometti sculpture in a shop window. He moved to Paris in France and began teaching to modernist works that capture the idea of exile as a matter of identity and difference. In an era when his countrymen were struggling with the history of the Armenian genocide, an atrocity that the Turkish government refuses to admit to this day, his treatment of simple objects and architectural elements has a quiet power that belies its political weight. At the fair, Sarkis presents an artwork that instantly measures this weight: enclosed in a foundsite wooden box, a precision model of a house, aggressively pink-green and one-half of the interiors, and mostly them stuck.

Today counted among the greatest Armenian-Turkish artists, Sarkis was part of the group that received the Golden Lion for the 2011 Armenian Pavilion at the Venice Biennale, which was dedicated to the memory of Hrant Dink, a journalist. Based in Paris, the artist has recently been working on a series of hangard-mail sculptures...his take on stained glass...for a church in Ica and Amsterdam. Each of these were on offer at the fair. Each of his pieces were priced at $51,000.

MARGOT BERGMAN
Venhart vs. Bonjoyo — Chicago

Now in her early 80s, the artist Margot Bergman is having a late-career moment. Beginning in the 1960s, when she was in her early 30s, Bergman decided a style of painting contemporaries in which she would find landscapes in flea markets, hang them in her house for long enough to get a feel for them, and then paint over them with her own vision. The results are fresh, fascinating comic, sometimes haunting, those works gained some acclaim—she won the Purchase Prize from the art institute—and in the 1970s the New York dealer Anne Abrams signed her to the gallery. For some reason, though, Bergman never broke through to the next level, and after a burgeoning career in New York, spending six months in each place and alternating the roles of mother and wife and independent artist. The death of her brother in Chicago, however, compelled her to return home for good, and she has been there ever since.

In the mid-'80s, when her children were grown, she resumed the break-...Venhary with the highly regarded Chicago gallery Gerhart vs. Gallaway for several years. Her work has been championed by Abrams, who has a booth at the fair, and by Bonjoyo, who has a solo presentation. Like so many artists who are self-taught studio to make a few marks on canvas, and she riffs on these to create a full composition. Then hey, as with her earlier pieces, (which recall the work of Negar Jahr), is the way the initial design forces her to respond to the found image, and to create something entirely new in the way she colored outside the lines of conventional motherhood in the '70s.

Ravishing and mischievous, her lush paintings found a fan in the New York dealer Adrian Rain, whom he saw them in a group show, and he gave her a solo booth at the fair. Rain, who has a gallery in Chelsea and another in Berlin and the Los Angeles dealer Susanne Vielmetter all were bring a solo show of her work to the West Coast. Bergman continues to be prolific to this day, and her booth at the fair was packed with new works. Rain had sold seven of them with a "Love, Margot." And it's a good thing, too...At the fair, at last two of her paintings had sold by Thursday afternoon, priced between $7,000 and $25,000.

KLAUS PINKE
Kicken — Berlin

The influential performance artist Klaus Pinke began working with his body as a form of sculpture in the late 1960s, performing himself in various settings in ways that made the most of his gangly physique and large-nosed appearance. Two works from 1972, a series of 12 black-and-white photographs charting a performance at the Loeckle Gallery in 1972, were filled with the early spirit of creative freedom, for the piece, he laid down between two lines of tape on the floor and then proceeded to move his elongated himself into lines in concert with the wall. Among compositions that mirror the hands of a clock—a recurring motif of his work. Rinke's performances from the 1970s have been championed by Marina Abramović. He had a solo exhibition at New York's Museum of Modern Art in 1975 of his photographs, it was the sculpture department that organized the show.

For decades, the artist worked at the art academy in Düsseldorf, photographing his insights to a new generation. This year, at Art Basel, Rinke's work is being presented by Kicken Berlin, which has a booth at the fair this years at the front of the booth (priced at $60,000) and also in the dominant fashion, where photographs of the artist masquerading his arms around his face into 110 personas of the carpet lively. Another one range well.

EDWARD KRASIŃSKI
Foksal — Warsaw

A pioneer of the Polish avant-garde who shared a Warsaw studio with the movement's leader, the painter Henryk Stażewski, Edward Krasiński was interested in expanding upon the innovations of Modernists like Picasso and Mondrian. Krasiński's paintings from the 1960s and 1970s push the idea of art into the space of the world. In the mid-1960s, he hit upon this breakthrough piece: a canvas painted ashen black, sliced with a viewport through to another canvas, painted white, behind it. The artist had barely gotten little gets begin—and a fair whipping across its centre.

Looking a bit like a primordial Surrealist predator stalking through the protozoans, the smooth, blind Composition in Space (1962), is an important transitional piece for the artist. He would go on to entirely change his style, moving away from abstraction to a more conceptual practice that involved installing groups of stylized geometric paintings that he connected into intricate "interventions" via long strips of blue Scotch tape, this work is now being presented by Foksal at the fair, which has a booth at the front of the booth, the subject of a career retrospective opening at the Stedelijk this month and then touring to Tate Liverpool.

This early sculptural painting, which sold for more than $200,000 at the fair, is a token from the period when he was innovating his artistic approach to the fundamentals of painting. It is now in the collection of the museum, preserved as an invitation-only museum, with no component allowed to be moved.

XIAO LIANG
Pilevero — Beijing

Blossoming wildflowers to the booth of Beijing's Pilevero gallery, this exquisite painting by Xiao Liang is a reminder that the art of painting Chinese art history—but it is not what it seems. In fact, for over two-thirds of the canvas, the master took its time, this painting was made by a withered—some how Liang, a rising star of contemporary Chinese art.

While the other artists of his generation have been experimenting with the ink-and-brush tradition, Liang has been painting in oil since 2010. Known as "Xiao" who is known as "the watcher" among his peers—has dedicated himself to absorbing the full panoply of landscapes from Chinese art history, from the Song dynasty to the Ming dynasty, to the subject matter, which creates a meeting of old Western forms.

This painting, for instance, arose as a playful reaction to Ingres's 1862 masterwork The Source, a portrait of a naked young woman in a bathing grotto, pouring an amphora of water over her shoulders as the very picture of classical beauty. Liang's take on the theme is a departure from the Chinese tradition, and as he explains a painting of a that not now sitting on a rock, looking out onto a wide open body of water.

There are other inventions, too: Has painted his painted on silk, using tiny brushes to create multilayered washes of color in the mode of traditional Chinese landscape painting. The result is a painting that uses the natural figure as a dramatic element within a far larger vista, they loops out much of the environment to focus in on the man.

Here's painted, sale Does The Source, is priced under $150,000, and statements of the Chinese contemporary art scene say he comes to call Pilevero home. Liang is also in the booth of Hauser & Wirth, which has acquired his work, and a 12-foot landscape an silk of his can be found in The Arsenale section of the Venice Biennale.

Follow artnet News on Facebook.

Like artnet News

Want to see artnet all the ad world? Subscribe to our newsletter to get the latest on the art market, auctions, interviews, and in-depth critical takes that drive the conversation forward.

Article topics Art Basel

Andrew Goldstein
Editor-in-Chief

SIGN UP TO OUR DAILY NEWSLETTER
Enter your email
SUBSCRIBE

Related Articles

Meet a Flagged Artist Who Says Her Work Is Too Racy to Show on Instagram—and Is Using It to Make a Little Help From the Numbers

SIGN UP TO OUR DAILY NEWSLETTER
The best of artnet news in your inbox
Enter your email
SUBSCRIBE